

ABSTRACT

The efficiency of a heat exchanger is significantly improved by forming walls in an air flow structure, which has first grooves formed in 5 the top surface of the structure and second grooves formed in the bottom surface of the structure, that block off alternating ends of the first and second grooves such that a first air source can only flow through the first grooves and a second air source can only flow through the second grooves.

10